The rule in this case is simple, and nothing but extravagance of affection and misguided partiality could make you mistake it. In all cases, whether children are fretful or pleased, the wisest method is to leave them very much to themselves, to discover those things which. will best amuse them. I never saw any fastidiousness respecting the object of pursuit, nor fretfulness occasioned by the enjoyment, when they were thus left. It is the wisdom and experience of the parents, directing their infant minds, and wishing to increase their happiness, that renders them miserable. Adopt another plan, and you will see its immediate good effects. Your children will not only enter with more spirit into their little diversions, without your assistance, but their activity will be exerted in exact proportion to their state of improvement. ment. They will be instructed in the important lesson of being pleased with what is within their reach, and, having little in their power, that taste for variety which is the bane of happiness in all the stages of life, will be effectually prevented. If it be good for a man to be happy and contented in the situation to...
